Your car got towed

BY SARAH WEDEL

This morning Northwestern students woke up to a surprise: empty parking lots. Where did all of the cars go?

“We were just experiencing way too much confusion about where students could and could not park for snow removal,” Head of Campus Security, Beter Poerema said. “So we just decided it would be easier if no cars were parked on campus overnight anymore during the winter months.”

The number of cars towed at night has increased dramatically in the last couple of weeks because many students have mistakenly left their cars parked in no overnight parking areas.

However, despite numerous and frequent emails from Campus Security dictating the parking regulations, students have been slow to catch on. So campus security decided last night that desperate times call for desperate measures.

“The last couple of weeks we have just become fed up with students that are incompilant with the parking rules,” Poerema said. “Something drastic had to be done.”

Last night, Poerema called all of the towing companies in Northwest Iowa to come and remove all the cars parked on campus.

“Parking on campus is a privilege not a right,” Poerema said. “If they are going to disregard our rules then we are going to revoke their parking privileges.”

It took a crew of thirty towing trucks all night to empty Northwestern’s parking lots. The cars were distributed around town to different business’ and churches’ parking lots. Some residents of Orange City event woke up this morning with new cars in their driveways.

Many students who needed to drive places this morning spent several hours wandering Orange City looking for their cars. Warthan Nedel said he found his car at Trinity church.

“In general, people were very happy that their cars were towed,” said Beter Poerema. “Most of them were very excited to see their cars.”

POEREMA SAYS HVY TOWING NECESSARY

Although the students were happy to see their cars, they were not happy that the parking spaces were taken from them.

“The students were not very happy about the parking,” Poerema said. “They didn’t like the idea of their cars being towed.”

However, despite the学生的不满，Parking on campus is a privilege not a right,” Poerema said. “If they are going to disregard our rules then we are going to revoke their parking privileges.”

One perk of attending the sessions is a free viewing of each film. Because of the time needed to watch the movies in their entirety, the sessions will run a bit longer than the nGage sessions that are happening now.

“Obviously the movies are all fairly substantial in their greatness, which also means they are long,” Eermeer Jelliot said. “The community and conversation following the movie will also be critical. So make sure to block out about four hours for each session.”

As a very special kick-off for the series, Cage himself will be attending the first session. He was unable to be interviewed due to the latest film he is working on. However, his agent Mark Hammitlen-Schauve said in a press release that “Mr. Cage is very excited to participate in such a prestigious session focusing on his high levels of success.”

Because of the secular nature of many of Cage’s films, the Christian conversation element will be excluded from the sessions.

“It can be difficult to apply Christianity to the films we’ll watch,” Chaplain Harlem Van Dordt said. “But we do encourage students to talk about how this affects their faith on social media, such as Facebook, Twitter or Yik Yak.”

Some students, however, are resistant to excluding their faith.

“I think it’s ridiculous to ignore the Christian element to Nic’s films,” said Nick Von Myerson. “Left Behind was one of the greatest representations of what it takes to be a Christian today, and I think we should embrace that and proclaim it to the haters on campus.”

“Left Behind” will be the first film to be shown and discussed on January 12. The session will begin at 6 p.m. in the Vogel Community Room. Students will be given free popcorn if they show their ID and pay the $2 admittance fee.

The nGage sessions will focus on several of Cage’s more popular and successful films, such as “Left Behind,” “Ghost Rider,” “Knowing,” “National Treasure” and one of the best cinematic masterpieces ever, “Raising Arizona.” Different themes and characters will be evaluated, and students will get the opportunity to dress up as Cage’s characters for a day in order to fully integrate themselves into the experience.

Five stages of defining the NW relationship

BY JESSIE SCHULDT
FEATURES CO-EDITOR

Young adults often have a difficult time accurately communicating their feelings toward one another. In light of this important social issue, Northwestern has decided to suggest several new guidelines to help males and females alike establish clear boundaries with the opposite gender.

The issue was brought to the attention of Colenbrander Resident Director Dusty Spam in his weekly meeting with resident assistants. Coly RAs explained that freshmen men in Coly were struggling to express their feelings to women without having that infamous awkward “talk.” With the help of Marvin Hammerdink and Vulie Eermeer-Jelliot, Spam has developed a five-level system for relationship identification.

The following scenarios are to act as a means of understanding this system.

Level One (Friendship):
You just met an individual of the opposite sex. You want to get to know them as a friend, so you invite them to spend time with you. If this is the situation, you should place two pieces of duct tape in the shape of a cross on the front of your door with the door propped open at least 3.5 feet.

Message communicated to individual: “Hey. I want to be your friend, but not a special friend at this moment in time.”

Level Two (Talking):
You have decided this is someone you seem to be compatible with, and the two of you have been “talking” or maintaining a steady level of communication throughout the day via text messaging and social media. It is recommended that you place a cinder block in the doorway of the room you occupy. The door fully propped open.

Message communicated to individual: “I am seeking to know you on a superficial level, but you aren’t significant other material just yet.”

Level Three (Dating):
You are now to the point of partaking in activities such as dinner, a movie or short bouts of vertical snuggling, thus classifying you as a dating couple. In this situation, ideally the door should be propped open 4.2 feet. This allows for you as a couple to have a level of privacy that will let you get to know one another, while still being accountable for your actions.

Message communicated to individual: “I am interested in pursuing your heart by spending more quality time with you.”

Level Four (Serious Dating): You have been going out together for a while, have made it Facebook official and have a designated date table in the caf. When hanging out in a room together, you are advised to place a hanger in the door (as that is the universal NW sign of being with someone you are attracted to).

Message communicated to individual: “I think you’re neat, and I want the world to know.”

Level Five (Engaged):
You did it! You achieved the highest pre-marriage level. If you need something to communicate your relationship level to the other person in the relationship at this point, you probably have an issue. But, just in case, it is recommended that you hang a Ring Pop on the door handle with the door propped completely open.

Message communicated to individual: “We’re getting married. I hope you know that.”

After releasing the first draft of these recommendations to a focus group of Coly freshmen, many men responded positively.

“I’ve been having a hard time explaining my true feelings for this girl in my FYS class,” Dalton Vandenlangenberg said. “Now that I know what to do, I hope that she’ll catch the hint that I really want to get to know her.”

The formal system will be laminated and placed in all RSC mailboxes at the beginning of the spring term.

Tic-Tac freshens up campus

BY WILL NORRIS
ASSISTANT

In an attempt to put Northwestern on the map, NW web and app developers in the computer science department are excited to introduce a new application for iOS and Android. The social media app Tic Tac is created to post anonymous, encouraging and uplifting tweet-length posts within the campus community.

Tic Tac, the app to freshen your day, allows anonymous posters to show their genuine support and encouragement for others. In Dean of Students Vulie Eermeer-Jelliot’s opinion, this is just the kind of thing campus stands for.

“Students at NW are all about bringing each other up,” Jelliot said. “And Tic Tac is a great way for students who are too timid to encourage people face-to-face to show their support by a few kind anonymous words. It’s a sort of passive reassurance.”

The app also has a proxy setting that makes sure that any negative or offensive words posted will be automatically changed to words of support. Words such as “stupid” or “ugly” will be shifted to NW appropriate praise words like “magnificent” or “glorious.”

“The app can never be discouraging,” Jelliot said. “Not necessarily because of what people post, but because it automatically changes discouraging words into uplifting ones.”

One of the newest features on the Tic Tac application is the ability for NW professors to up-vote the post or double-up-vote the post, depending on the level of encouragement. That way, professors can connect to students without sacrificing their position of authority.

With the high level of encouragement coming from the Tic Tac app, Jelliot plans not only for professors to up-vote students, but for NW to up student enrollment.

“By introducing Tic Tac to our social media at NW, our hope is that prospective students will see the reassuring community we have on campus,” Jelliot said.

“This app, intended to ‘freshen your day,’ will hopefully freshen NW perspective and ultimately freshen prospective’ perspective on NW.”

Starting Jan. 9, 2015, Tic Tac will be downloaded on every computer connected to the NW web server under the TacAgent.

Dordt accepts failure, changes name

BY STEPHEN DYKSTRA

Longtime rival Dordt College recently announced its intentions to officially change its name. After several months of market research, focus groups and opinion polls, Dordt will now be known as Northwest Northwestern College, as confirmed by a statement released on Monday. “We firmly believe this is the best step for the institution,” Dordt president Nicolas Cage said. “We’re finding that most prospective students in our market are much more receptive to the term ‘Northwesterner’ than any other name.”

Although most current Dordt students, faculty and staff are questioning the decision, Northwestern College sees this as an opportunity to further differentiate itself from the school’s closest competitor. “If anything, I think we should be honored that our CRC homies to the northwest are so fond of us,” NW President Craig Gristy said. “President Cage let me know that Dordt was seriously considering the transition, and to be honest, I didn’t think they’d do it. Well, I guess I was wrong.”

Aside from a strategic shift designed to attract more students — a plan perhaps the current NW doesn’t think will detract their own prospects — Dordt’s reasons for stepping away from its old name are somewhat personal. “Personally, I was sick of hearing about ‘Dork College’ and ‘friends don’t let friends go to Dordt’ and all of that crap,” Cage said. “Since this institution could never really produce any worthwhile comebacks, my administration decided that if we couldn’t be better than NW, we might as well join them.”

In contrast to Gristy’s previous comments, the NW public relations office expressed concern for Dordt’s recent name shift. “I don’t like it all,” PR director Bane Deeson said. “This jeopardizes our entire brand promise as an academic community engaging students in courageous and faithful learning and living that empowers them to follow Christ and pursue God’s redeeming work in the world. Now we’re gonna have to find a new mission statement, and it feels like we literally just got it.”

Formerly-Dordt’s president Nicolas Cage discusses the college’s recent name change. The decision came to be after several years of poor name recognition, weak branding, and decreasing enrollment. "I just wanna know if Dordt’s gonna keep its colors the same," student Nathan Hot-Wheels said with some anxiety in his voice. "My entire closet is centered on our school colors of red and white, and I couldn’t imagine trying to revamp my wardrobe. I mean, come on, nobody wants to look like a Dordt student." It’s evident that the switch will complicate things for both institutions. Prospective students probably have a difficult time differentiating between the two schools. This could be problematic for those who believe in the separation of RCA and CRC institutions.

“I’m not worried,” Gristy said. “When potential students step foot onto our campus, the community will overwhelm them, suck them in, and won’t let go until they graduate five years later. Dordt doesn’t even stand a chance.”

When asked if NW would press charges against Dordt for trademark infringement, Gristy said that “it’s not in the school’s best interest. Such conflict would ultimately harm our own community on campus.”

Update Box

Update: Peter Boerema is no longer worried about overnight student parking during snow removal. He has instead starting giving tickets to the weather for the unnecessary amounts of snow. Update: NW determines Raider Days to be too big of a success to only do one weekend a year. Homecoming celebrations will now be held every weekend. Update: Cafeteria staff has installed metal detectors on all Caf doors and security cameras throughout the building to prevent any future “mishaps.”

Update and warning: It was previously reported that the C.C. beans are a new trend on campus. However, the FDC has issued a health warning concerning the beans and their relation to ringworm. Students are urged to stop wearing the beans immediately.

Update: Previously, the Beacon has published two articles celebrating beards and long hair. However, NW has determined beards and long hair to be unprofessional and is issuing a new dress code and appearance requirement demanding haircuts and shaves for the men on campus.
