Let me begin with a review of the financial situation, since this is a major matter of concern with colleges today. The Chinese name their years after animals. 1970, for example, was the year of the Dog. Colleges have no such cyclical schemes for labeling their years, but if I were to try to capture the past year in a short phrase, I would call it the year of the tightened belt. The news media have given extensive coverage to the time of serious financial hardship which has hit colleges and universities of all sorts: small and large; private and public; east, west, north and south.

The principal factors contributing to this predicament include inflation, driven rises in costs; failure of contributions to keep pace with rise in costs; and higher education's loss of priority resulting in a cutback in federal programs. Contributing factors on campuses included planning based on the growth and support patterns that had existed from about 1964 until 1967 and especially in the post-Sputnik decade; greatly expanded programs of student aid to help needy students get an education in a time of rising costs (e.g., Northwestern students received $543,000 in aid, $204,000 of which came from Northwestern students operating funds); the inflexible nature of a college owing to the fact that most of its costs are fixed and based on commitments a college must make well in advance; and a general lack of strong planning and management procedures. These varied from campus to campus, but they complicated the situation as the economic situation in the country changed.

As we've pointed out in several communications, 1969-70 was the year these things hit Northwestern. The operating deficit for that year was almost $237,000. It was some comfort that the Reserve Fund, which maintains and amortizes our residence halls, and the expansion (capital) fund each showed healthy surpluses, but so large an operating deficit was a matter of utmost seriousness. It was further complicated by the fixed commitments of the college for 1970-71. Hence, taking the most pessimistic view of every foreseeable contingency, my annual report to the Board of Trustees projected a deficit of $260,000 for this year. Happily it did not turn out that way. The June 30 financial statement showed a deficit of $127,000. This is still a large operating deficit. But for a college to reduce its operating deficit by more than $100,000 in a year in which its fixed costs had already been set is a noteworthy accomplishment and came from a fine team effort. Students and faculty cooperated heartily in holding spending to the necessities. The business office kept tight budget controls and improved fiscal reporting. The admissions staff brought in our largest freshman class resulting in our largest enrollment in history (769). The work of the Steering Committee begins to bear fruit this Fall. The first phase of the liberal arts core program we are developing will be a multi-disciplinary approach to the freshman course in the History of Western Civilization. Faculty specialists in art, music, philosophy, and Bible will join the history faculty in presenting a more total approach to learning and for a deeper Christian interpretation of mankind's perennial questions about the meaning and purpose of life.
In the following portion of this issue you will find a list of those who have given to Northwestern this past year. We are grateful for these co-laborers in the cause of Christian higher education. You will also find our financial statement for 1970–71 and the approved budget for 1971–72.

Note: We have made a diligent effort in editing this report. It is possible that we have made a clerical error in which case we apologize and will make the correction in the next issue of the Classic. Please let us know.
